THE WITHEY SYSTEM FOR DETERMINING WHETHER THE SIKA ENTRIES ENTERED INTO NEW ZEALAND DEERSTALKERS' NATIONAL ANTLER, HORN AND TUSK COMPETITIONS QUALIFY AS BEING SIKA AND NOT SIKARED HYBRID

The Withey system as below including the guide notes be used by the National AHT judging panel as a guideline for determining whether the Sika entries entered into the AHT competition qualify as being Sika and not Sika/Red hybrid. The system would only be used as a guideline and as always the Panel's collective decision would be final.

Skull Length

The skull length of 13 ½" is measured from the lambdoidal ridge at the back of the skull to the front of the premaxilla bones at the tip of the nose.

The skull length measurement is considered to be a significant indicator for the identification of mixed genetics. Measurements below 13 ½" in length are typically very sikine in character. Once over the 13 ½" mark other character influences and antler conformation anomalies become more common. These discrepancies become increasingly noticeable as the skull length increases.

2 points are awarded for skulls 13 ½" or less. NO points are to be awarded for excessive length or to any skulls with damaged measuring ridges or bones (unless it is obvious that the skull would not have exceeded the 13 ½" mark).

Skull Sutures

The skull suture criterion is a visual assessment of the shape of the junction between the frontal and the parietofrontal sutures. This junction lies between the pedicles of the stags antlers. Typically a sikine skull will display a 'T' shaped junction, but variations in the length of the 'T' cross bar and the fusion of the sutures in older animals may make this discernment challenging. If in doubt points should not be awarded in this section.

Brow Tines

The angulation of the brow tines must be sloping upwards and outwards from the line of the main beam if the head is held in a natural position.

Both tines must be angulated correctly to attain a point in this section.

A distinguishable separation (gap) between the coronet and the base of the brow tine must be present. A good indicator of this is the shape of the coronet which should be round if a separation is present or distorted into an oval if there is no gap.

Both sides of the antler must conform to award the point.

Trez Tines

When the antler is viewed from the side-on position, the angulation of the trez tine should appear to be inline with the main beam, almost as if it were a continuation of the beams natural sweep and curve. The curvature and flow from the main beam into the trez tine is the critical factor and deviations and abrupt angle changes will not be awarded a point in this section. Both sides must be correct to attain the point.

The location of the trez tine along the main beam is considered sikine when it occurs at or above the halfway point of the beam. Measurements should be taken from the base of the coronet to the DS point of the trez, then from the main crotch of the tops down to the DS point. Both tines must be at or above halfway to be awarded the point.

Top Tines

Typically sikine 'tops' face almost dead square to the front, so that when the head is viewed from the side it is difficult to identify the inner tine as it is shadowed by the outer. Some very slight turning inward or outward may be acceptable if the 'tops' 'look' right in their overall shape. Both sets must be correct to be awarded the point.

The outer tops in Sika are typically longer than the inner ones. This configuration is conducive with the outers being an extension and continuation of the main beam toward its termination.

But for the purpose of allocating the point here, both the outer tines must be at least fractionally longer than the inners. Care must be taken to focus on the main top tine when additional tines are present, i.e. inner off or outer off tines.

Sikine Reinforcing Ridging & Texture

The presence of sikine ridging on an antler is a key characteristic identifying Sika genetics. The ridging usually starts on top of the brow tine and runs up the front of the main beam, to various heights. The ridging distorts and strengthens the shape of the beam and tines into a tear dropped cross sectional shape.

Reasonable reinforcement signs must be present on both sides to award the point here.

Sikine type antler vein lines, the pearling and their stain colouration is noticeably different than other deer species. The antlers have a relatively deeply grooved vein line running up the back of the beam and the patterning is unique to Sika. The pearling is very rough where it cannot be worn down by the animals rubbing. Antlers taken early in the season will have more pearling present than heads taken later (caution should be used to ensure cleaned antlers are not favoured over dirty, mud encrusted sets that may still have velvet remains hiding the true texture). Finally the stain colouration on Sika antlers is usually significantly lighter than a Red deer's antler staining. This anomaly maybe due to a tree species preference each species chooses for rubbing or as a consequence of the known difference between their antler densities, either way the observation is quite useful in this section. A point may be awarded if the overall appearance is correct.
